Q: How to set up navigation for two UITabBarController, each with a custom UINavigationController? I have an app where I would like to have two UITabBarController on the main page. Right now I have done something similar to this: My first UITabBarController is handling login and setting of a "signin" session variable. My second UITabBarController then shows a navigation controller with various "Home" buttons. If I am logged in, I click on a "Home" button, then I am automatically taken to the signin view. If I am not logged in, I click on a "Home" button, then I am taken to the signin view. My question is: How can I prevent the second UITabBarController from being shown if I am already logged in? I want to use the second UITabBarController only if I am not logged in.

A: In your first UITabBarController, don't do anything to login, just return. Now, if you come back, your second UITabBarController should be shown.

Contrast-induced nephropathy: an update. Contrast-induced nephropathy (CIN) is an important and common complication after exposure to a radiocontrast agent and it is a risk factor for acute kidney injury. A risk stratification and prevention approach, which includes volume expansion and strict hemodynamic control, has been the mainstay of CIN management. Reversal of contrast nephropathy, which includes hydration and administration of the intravenous N-acetylcysteine, remains a topic of controversy. In addition, various pharmacologic agents have been proposed for CIN prevention but they are generally not associated with mortality benefit. The prophylactic use of various inhibitors of the renin-angiotensin system (e.g., aliskiren, irbesartan, losartan) to prevent CIN remains to be proven.

For the management of CIN, a risk-adapted approach should be adopted based 82157476af
